Each weekday, about 30 million students in the United States eat a school lunch. Then they fill cafeteria trash cans with uneaten food.

Wasted food is a waste of money, a missed chance to feed hungry people, and bad for the environment. That's why schools are trying to reduce the number of food in the trash. "We don't want good food to go to waste," said

Nancy Deming, who works for the Oakland Unified School District, in California.

Schools have several ways to cut down on food waste. Students are often hungrier after active play, so having lunch after a break can reduce waste. Making the lunch period longer also helps. It gives kids more time to eat. In Oakland, schools set up share tables. Students put untouched food on the share tables, and other students can take the food if they want it.

Sometimes, students waste food because they don't like how it tastes. Chef Sam Icklan wants to change that. In one school, kale often went untouched. Icklan used the kale as a pizza topping and called the dish Green Monster Pizza. Kids loved it. "It became a beautiful, vibrant dish," he says. "Who wouldn't eat that?"
